The standard management of fractures of the femur and tibia remains the operative or intra- or extra-articular fixation of the fracture fragments. However, it is increasingly evident that correctly applied non-operative treatment is sometimes successful in preventing the need for surgery. Non-operative treatment is less likely to be successful if the surgical technique is ill-advised or if there is a delay in applying non-operative treatment. Obviously, close clinical surveillance is necessary. As the choice of treatment becomes more difficult, the use of a fracture classification system becomes essential.
