Joe Biden's presidential campaign has taken a beating from the Democratic Party's left and some white voters who think he's too "moderate." Instead, the former vice president has been gaining ground in the polls since his debate performance last month. Joe Biden's campaign has endured an uncertain and wild month. Despite a recent spike in the polls and a financial windfall, Biden has struggled to move the needle on his winning message. With the other Democratic candidates duking it out on the left, Biden's campaign has been left to fend for itself. One of the biggest blowouts in the Democratic race happened when Biden's new national campaign manager was demoted after he was involved in a controversial press call in South Carolina. CLICK HERE TO READ MORE FROM TUCKER CARLSON. But Biden is also losing support from the left. His campaign came under fire after a leaked memo showed that the campaign planned to throw gendered language at supporters, asking them to say "literally" instead of "figuratively." That has hurt Biden with women and people of color. Biden has also been at odds with the left over their characterization of his administration and his electability. Biden has been forced to forcefully defend his record against progressive activists and their leaders, who think that he doesn't have the experience or the toughness to run a multi-million dollar campaign. And Biden's campaign has been hobbled by the loss of a number of key players and support. Biden's former campaign manager, and former Delaware senator, Mike Gravel, has endorsed Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders. And new polling shows that some voters are souring on Biden as a result. There was no better example than the results of last week's Iowa caucuses. That's when former South Bend, Indiana, Mayor
