Elegant. Classic. Most of the time when I get an email from a bride wanting to know about something "classy," I just stop right there. My first reaction is, "Yeah right." "What's wrong with the boudoir photos at your wedding site?" I want to ask. And then I feel all the things I've been feeling all my life. Like, "You're all too young to even know what class is." "Why would anyone pay money to look at pictures of someone else's wedding? Isn't it bad enough that you're paying for your wedding? When did you decide that it was OK to pay for your wedding photos too?" But I do know that there are a lot of people out there who don't believe in paying for photos, and I want to be clear that I am one of them. Especially when it comes to portraits. I mean, of course you need a photographer. You're having people at your wedding who will probably take more pictures than you do during the rest of your life. But really, I'm a firm believer in this: People want to look at pictures of themselves. And if you're having a large wedding, you'll probably have pictures of yourself anyway, so it makes sense that you should have some pictures taken too. The Bridal Magazine's rule: The publication's top photographers are not just given free reign. Instead, they're assigned to choose several high-profile, well-known brides. The magazine picks a certain number of brides, and the photographers are allowed to choose as many as they want to shoot. At the end of their allotted time, the magazine chooses the best from the bunch, and the photographer is usually given one or two more hours to capture all the remaining pictures. So, the magazine gets to choose which shots are best, and the photographer gets to choose which shots he/she wants to shoot. Everyone has to wait until the last moments to see
