Port.Menu My weeks far from H-E-B Salsa Ranch Market are down to a science. I get to work at 11:15 am, sometimes sooner and sometimes later. My usual route is the west side through the "old" part of town. I travel in front of the school where a small bell rings when the school bus arrives. As the bus parks in the lot I step outside and look for my next victim. I step in line and count the minutes before they call my name. The employee holds out the list. I wait, day after day, for my number to be called. I ask for specific kinds of produce or meat. They assign me a ticket. I pick up my ticket, collect my food and start my journey through H-E-B Salsa Ranch. I hit the gas and am off. I am always careful not to cut anyone off. Some of the roads are like air, smooth going, with no traffic, and no road work. The gas station is usually on the way to the store so I still get gas there too. I feel a rush of adrenaline when I hear the bell for the school bus and am ready to go. I get to the store at noon and usually carry my groceries in my pockets. On bad days I put them in a cart and go to the check-out line. There is a natural rhythm to the experience, a feel, a routine. I have a tight schedule, between the school bus, the store and the store dog. I calculate my miles each week, I know my fuel stops and I have a route I am pretty familiar with. The schedule is always "like clockwork" but of course it is not. In the spirit of transparency, I did a little internet search to find out what a H-E-B Salsa Ranch Market hours might look like. According to the H-E-B website, if I recall correctly, H-E-B, or whatever it now

Tumor-infiltrating lymphocytes (TILs) are a product of the immune system that are recruited to a tumor in response to various tumor-specific antigens and growth factors. TILs have been implicated in all stages of tumor progression. In established tumors, TILs may promote the growth of tumor cells by providing a target for tumor cell and angiogenic factors, by contributing to tumor-associated neovascularization, and by stimulating angiogenesis. Under certain circumstances, however, TILs may also facilitate the death of tumor cells through a variety of mechanisms, including immune recognition of MHC antigens in the absence of cytokines, and through release of cytokines and cytotoxic granules. In other instances, TILs may exert direct antitumor activity against tumor cells by killing the cells through Fas/Fas ligand interaction or by inducing apoptosis through release of perforin or granzyme. Moreover, TILs may participate in tumor regression by serving as antigen-presenting cells to prime host immune responses to tumor cells. In this review, we describe the cytotoxic effector cells involved in the activation and suppression of TILs and highlight mechanisms of TIL-mediated tumor destruction. Finally, we discuss opportunities and challenges to harness these cells in developing 3e33713323
