According to the company, AutoCAD 2016 is the fastest and most powerful release of AutoCAD ever. It introduces a new wireframing feature that lets you use a web browser to view, edit, and share wireframes with the team, and helps you communicate with the team to ensure your design is complete. AutoCAD: This model looks similar to a mobile phone. “We are excited to be introducing a revolutionary new user experience and framework for both desktop and mobile AutoCAD users. With AutoCAD, you can now be even more productive by utilizing cloud storage and editing capabilities with a web browser. In addition to a redesigned wireframing tool, we’re introducing collaborative editing capabilities that use the power of the cloud to help you improve the design process.”—AutoCAD Product Manager Lars Soderberg

Users of the software have reported security issues as far back as 2015, according to the tech website Motherboard. In November, hackers posted the source code for a “worm” they claimed could defeat the latest version of the program, AutoCAD 2013. Carla Rowden, a spokesperson for Autodesk, says the company has taken “many steps to enhance the security of AutoCAD.” The software recently began to use end-to-end encryption that is both password protected and re-keyed every week, so that users’ data is only accessible to their own computers, she says. The company is also pushing end-user training, and has created “a hardened environment” that prevents malware from taking over the application, Rowden says. In some ways, you could argue that AutoCAD has been moving more toward the cloud for some time, Rowden says. But the cloud is evolving much more quickly and dramatically than AutoCAD has been able to do. The app, for example, is not integrated with Dropbox, Google Drive, or OneDrive—it’s an online service that requires a payment of $70 per month for it to work. It’s not all bad news, though. If you use Office 365, AutoCAD is included in that product and is fully integrated with it. And if you have an iPad, the app has been enhanced with a new version of Apple’s in-app purchase functionality that lets you buy extra AutoCAD licenses. Autodesk also announced AutoCAD 2018 on Thursday

He's been divorced and publicly ridiculed by Republicans and Democrats alike, and you probably don't even know it. But it turns out that the Obama administration has been happily married to immigration for some time. The Supreme Court's decision last week to uphold President Obama's executive action on immigration was "a great victory for us," said White House spokesman Eric Schultz on Tuesday. Obama himself, Schultz noted, "went to the White House press briefing" when the ruling came down. So the Democratic Party has the Supreme Court on its side. What could go wrong? Schultz said that the administration hasn't found anyone willing to be the "prosecutor" of the president's deferred action program — the administration's implementation of the president's executive order on prosecutorial discretion, which authorizes immigration agents to, in the words of Obama, "put the breaks on the deportation machinery." As you might expect, there are a number of troubling things about this. To start with, it's a tremendous abdication of the duty to enforce the law in favor of personal political favoritism, a decision made all the worse by the fact that the president is an attorney and has the power of the presidency behind him. What's more, the political retaliation against Republicans and companies that refuse to comply with the law has been ruthless. Advertisement Why would a Justice Department opt to look the other way when a president of the United States is flouting the law? I can think of several reasons: Because it's beneath the Justice Department's dignity to enforce the law when the president is telling everybody not to do it. Because it's beneath the Justice Department's dignity to investigate or prosecute political favors. Because the president and his flunkies have made a habit of abusing power for political purposes. It's not a new strategy; look at Eric Holder's violations of the law to protect the president's reelection. Because the president does not want to enforce
