From Multi-Game Multi-Platform. Regulation of human platelet protein kinase C activity: effects of storage. Human platelets contain at least three species of protein kinase C (PKC). The major species is a cytosolic PKC that is stored in alpha granules in close association with an unidentified phosphatidylcholine-specific phospholipase C. The two other PKC species are released upon activation of the cells. One of these PKC isozymes is a membrane-associated PKC. We have investigated the effects of storage at room temperature on the activity of platelet PKC in platelet-rich plasma (PRP) and in washed platelets. SDS-polyacrylamide gel electrophoresis (PAGE) of platelets that were stored for up to four days showed that approximately 50% of the PKC activity in PRP, as assayed by the phosphorylation of an exogenous substrate, was lost during the storage period. The loss of PKC activity in PRP could not be prevented by the addition of PTHrP to the storage medium, but it was prevented by the inclusion of L-cysteine or NEM in the medium. Washed platelets stored in the presence of L-cysteine
