<https://recommando.livemood.com/> The nadir of the Dark Ages was during the Middle Ages, approximately the period between 537 and 1500. Some would go as far as to say it was a virtual millennium, others would give more credit to the Renaissance. Before the beginning of the Middle Ages, Europe had been relatively peaceful. As a result of the Western Roman Empire's collapse and prolonged period of instability, the notion of a European state as the centre of power began to disintegrate and the concept of the nation-state began to emerge. Like its associated religions, the Middle Ages combined pagan and Christian traditions, but the merger was a controversial one. On the Christian side, the ability of classical learning to promote humanistic goals led to the development of humanism as a school of thought, which was centered on the individual. By the 12th century, the philosophers and theologians of the medieval church had developed the concept of what would later become known as natural law. The period saw the opening of universities and the development of trade. The Vikings had established themselves in the British Isles during the early Middle Ages and would go on to establish a long lasting North Sea Empire. This period began a process of gradual Christianization, the conversion of the Northmen to Christianity and the development of both a permanent and institutional church. The Viking period made advances in trading and technological development, particularly in the North Sea. Biterialism and Feudalism were originally secular European political systems. The warlords who were allowed to establish themselves as sovereign states would
